UNDER VICKSBURG'S GUNS

Traits Displayed by General Grant in a Memorable Campaign.

PROGRESS OF THE GRANT MONUMENT

Sufficient Funds Secured to Suitably Mark the Resting Place of the Great Captain-General Sherman on Notoriety-

A Church as a Memorial.

I saw General Grant under fire several times during the Vicksburg campaign.

all his corps commanders - of whom there were three at Vicksburg-were engaged lid he take full control. Thus in his 'Memoirs" he speaks of being "with Sherman" at a certain battle on one day,

'with McPherson" at another battle on another day, and so on; but when it comes to an engagement in which all his troops participated he makes it plain that everything was under his personal control and direction. The two assaults on the confederate works at Vicksburg were two cecasions of this kind. The second of these assaults took place on the 22d of May, when the whole army, with scaling ladders, forlorn hopes and all the ingredients of the terrible thunder of battle, made a desperate but unsuccessful effort to capture the confederate stronghold. As the bearer of an unimportant message from a division commander, I had an opportunity of seeing the great soldier in one of the most eventful hours of his eventful life.

I had been told to look for him "some where near the center, and well to the front," and I found him very well to the front, and almost exactly in the center of a line extending from the Yazoo river on the right to the southern limits of Vicksburg on the left. He was the least military-looking member of a small group, consisting, in addition to him-self, of staff officers and orderlies—six or eight in all. He wore a soft hat surrounded by a cord, on which there were traces of gold thread, and a blouse without shoulder straps-a garment of which a second lieutenant would not have felt proud. But while careless of his own garments, he had imitated Caligula by conferring rank upon his horse, whose saddle cloth bore the glittering double stars of a major-general.

Only his left leg was in a stirrup, the right was drawn up and seemed to be twisted round the pom-mel of the saddle. In his left hand the general held a pine stick, which he was whittling with a big knife grasped in the right. In his mouth was a cigar, which he was smoking violently,

I delivered my message, to which an approving nod was all the answer required or given. The general continued to whittle and smoke without betraying the slightest emotion. It was about noen, and the battle had been raging since 10 o'clock—every man of the whole army engaged. The staff officers and orderlies in the group around the general were discussing the situation in all forms and degrees of agitation, but the general said nothing un-little. He was watching with his ears rather than with his eyes, because the range of vision was short owing to the trees and the fortifications. He listened to the firing as the noise advanced or reshell from a confederate battery plowed into the ground near where our party stood. The general, without moving a muscle except of his legs, straihtened his staff officers, "That battery ought to have been silenced an hour ago. See why it has not been silenced." The general renewed the attack on his pine cil. I mustered courage enough to approach him and ask how the battle was going. He answered in a very pleasant voice that he thought every-he meant was that there was much heavy fighting over trenches and earthworks and against almost impregnable was and the actual possession of the stronghold. I am satisfied now that when the general answered my question he had made up his mind that the assault was a failure, and that Vicksburg could not be taken in that way, but there was nothing in his manner or voice to indicate that he had reached such a conclusion. There probably would not have been the slightest noticeable change in his manner or voice if, instead of defeat, from him by any change of fate or fortune. If his army had been annihilated he might have smoked two cigars at a time instead of one, but that is as far as his emotions would have carried him, at least in their outward manifestation. I started back whence I had come with my message and learned in a short time that the troops were coming back, leaving Vicksburg still in confederate hands. That night I heard General Grant say:

We'll have to dig our way in," and so it happened. In the memoirs the work of the 22d is not treated as a disaster, but rather as an unsuccessful experiment.

The siege began immediately and at the end of six weeks General Grant took din-
